Saturded Solution.

A substance is said to undergo solution when the force of adhesion between it and a liquid in which it is immersed is sufficient to overcome the force of cohesion between the solid particles. The liquid which affects the solution is termed the solution is described by the solution is definite quantity of liquid capable of dissolving it, the first portions disappear most quickly, and each portion dissolves more solvy till the liquid causes to possess any solvent power. When this coccurs, the solution is said to be saturated, the powers of cohesion being behanced. But saturation may exist with regard to one body and not to another. Thus water saturated vith common salt will statustion may exist with regard to one body solves. So also a saturated solution of common salt will statustion of common salt will statustion of common salt will statustion of temperature produce but little effect. Thesa cold water will take up nearly as much common salt as hot water. The saturating power of bothes is in ramy cases greatly influenced by heat, while in others variations of temperature under will take up nearly as much common salt as hot water but sulpints of soid als more soluble in hot water than in cold, and the solution as a sutrated solution of the sulpints of soid as is nore soluble in hot water than in cold, and any of the dissolved solid separating from it. The solution would then contain more of the solid than it would contain at the particular temperature under ordinary conditions.
